British Army in Northern Ireland

Author: Lieutenant Colonel Michael Dewar

Publisher: Guild publishing

Edition:

Book Size: 235mm x 155mm

Pages:

Volumes: 1

Condition: Good

Jacket Condition: Fair

Binding: Hardcover

Description: Dust Jacket is badly torn. In 1969 British soldiers were ordered into the streets of riot torn Belfast, their task to form a disciplined human buffer between two warring communities inspired by a centuries old fear and hatred. They had seen such scenes before, and had been stoned, shouted at and fired upon from both sides during British retreat from Empire in the preceding two decades. But now the troubles were in the United Kingdom itself, on their own doorsteps. As the level of conflict escalated, so the role of the peacekeepers became increasingly dangerous, bricks were followed by petrol bombs, snipers bullets, mortar bombs, mines and even rockets. Civilians died, so too did soldiers.

The County of Devon can claim to have been the most militarily active county in England during the course of the second World War. Devon at War is the only book that fully covers events of the home front during the War years, setting them against the ebb and flow of the conflict between the Allied and Axis forces. From Plymouth sailed Royal Navy war ships that were to take part in epic sea battles. On Devons beaches were trained the men of the Allied armies who took part in the D day invasion of 6 June 1944, including tens of thousands of American troops who sailed from Devons ports. Devon at War is a remarkable photographic and written record of the country and the people of Devon during the turbulent years of the world war two.
